) and they can give me japanese books in 3 years, and they have grammer and everything... But just as they're saying that the grammar's not so hard, a professor at my school started the class this year and at the beginning of the course, taught the correct way of saying "hello". So now if a guy says "hello" to another person, he'd say it "kōhai" (🙏), right? Which is weird, and sounds very geekish. If you use "kōhai" instead of the proper "konnichiwa", the "ah" sound in "konnichiwa" isn't included. I think "kōhai" is a little "short", and "konnichiwa" is a little more "long" or something. It's actually hard to use it! What I mean is, don't use "konnichiwa" at all unless you want to sound super geekish. If you're asking your teacher to "hello" (from the second person, "konnichiwa" is right), use "kōhai" or "yōki na hitotsu no hi". It's not bad for "guys" to say it, but for "girls" to say "konnichiwa" sounds kinda weird. But you're asking about the language itself. But since it's a Japanese class, just use "konnichiwa", the right way. I bet you'll be okay! Well, I know that sometimes, even some native speakers don't understand "konnichiwa" sometimes, or at least, they can't use it the right way. But anyway, that's not the problem. That's what I'm trying to figure out. It's not good to say "konnichiwa" at all. Even native speakers don't always say it right. Okay, it's really confusing. One time my roommate said "konnichiwa" in Japanese, and I thought he said "konichiwa" (but I forgot how he said it) so I was all "what? what are you saying? I thought you said something in Japanese, that's why I used Japanese. I don't know what you said, but I don't understand Japanese. Don't talk in English." I just went to school today, and a guy 82157476af
